Anxiety and Avoidance Among Weight-Loss Participants Follow an Expanded Antecedent-Focused Intervention. Although research supports Expanded Antecedent-Focused Intervention (EA-FI) as an efficacious psychological weight-loss treatment for those with eating-disordered psychopathology, only recent work has examined factors that can increase treatment success among participants with co-occurring eating-disordered psychopathology. The current study measured anxiety and avoidance, two factors considered important by EA-FI users, among 40 weight-loss participants, 26 of whom were currently enrolled in EA-FI. Participants showed substantial improvement on EA-FI's effectiveness scales at posttreatment but not at 6-month follow-up, and they showed increases in anxiety and avoidance. Participants who reported higher anxiety at preintervention were more likely to show improved effectiveness at posttreatment. There were no significant interactions between improvement on effectiveness scales and preintervention anxiety or avoidance. The current findings provide preliminary support for using preintervention anxiety and avoidance to predict weight-loss outcomes among EA-FI participants. Hackers continue to prove that they can penetrate security at some of the world's most powerful companies and spy on top executives. The most recent attack shows up as an email that appears to come from a senior executive at an unidentified company, according to Sophos. And it appears to contain information that could have a direct impact on the business. The person in question appears to be working in the U.S. in an important role in an engineering, operations or software sales department, according to the email. But when the employee opened the email, he or she found a password reset email containing four random numbers followed by a string of capital letters and a number, which, when entered, dropped the employee into an interactive page on the company's website for access to specific files. This type of brute-force attack, where the attacker tries different combinations of numbers and letters, is known as a "rainbow table attack." And it means that someone with the ability to force access to an employee's computer could probably easily gain access to that employee's email, even if they didn't have that person's password. And this type of vulnerability has already been exploited by hackers. "Hackers have been known to reset passwords in this manner to try to obtain access to a wide variety of accounts, including bank accounts, credit cards," said Jeffrey Sojotka, a senior security consultant at Sophos. "However, we do not recommend attempting such an attack. Instead, change your account passwords. A hacker can only do so much before he or she is identified." Another vulnerability in the security system could be the email's attachment. The email contains two documents -- one a PDF containing the original message sent to the employee and one containing a script with a CGI header. So when the employee clicked on the attachment, the malware on the page started to execute. The malware, in this case, uses Flash Player, an open-source software created by Adobe Systems. It is possible that an organization with an anti-malware software could detect the malicious script and remove it before the employee could open the attached file, Sojotka said. But an organization without such software might not be able to catch the attack in time and might have to block access to its website entirely. "Unfortunately, the use of JavaScript in emails is not new,◆
