The static cough drive was examined as a function of changing inspiratory load. Five normal subjects were studied. The static cough drive was assessed in each subject by the number of coughs evoked by intrapulmonary aerosol spray applied to the trachea. Subjects inhaled the following loads: 0, 4, 8, 12, 16, 24, 32, and 40 cm H₂O. Following the cough test, an albuterol chloride aerosol was administered and a 15-second forced expiratory volume (FEV) was measured. The results indicate that: (1) the static cough drive depends on inspiratory load; (2) increases in static cough drive occur with increases in inspiratory load; and (3) maximum cough occurs at approximately 16 cm H₂O. The data suggest that static cough is a reflex which increases with increases in inspiratory load. Movie theater owners are being increasingly forced to charge people for bringing their own food into theaters for fear they might damage the seats. More theaters are restricting sales of popcorn and sodas, while others are asking moviegoers to leave containers of food behind or pay for them to be cleaned off and returned to them before the show is over. Exact dollar amounts charged to people bringing food into theaters are not being disclosed, but industry data reviewed by The Associated Press shows the practice is increasingly common. A movie-going tradition since the 1930s, the sale of popcorn at movie theaters has faced numerous challenges from cost to cleanliness. In addition, McDonald's, Taco Bell and other fast-food chains have increasingly moved into theaters as business dries up at other locations. For decades, people brought their own popcorn or soda into theaters and shared the refreshments in the lobby, but the practice quickly became an annoyance to theater owners and their employees, some of whom were afraid moviegoers would damage the seats or even slip down in them and hurt themselves. A year ago, the National Association of Theater Owners asked moviegoers to stop bringing food and drinks into theaters. The request became even more urgent in 2017, when the movie industry, which had avoided regular inflation adjustments for more
